

THERE WERE REALLY 5 GORGONS

According to Greek Mythology, there were three Gorgon sisters, Stheno, Eurysale, and Medusa. Medusa had her head cut off by Perseus. Gorgons are dreadful female creatures with a serpent tail and snake skin. According to some legends concerning them their hair was made of living snakes. Looking into their eyes instantly transforms you into stone.

Like all stories of mythology there are fragments of truth to it. The stories circulating about them today claim there was only three of them. This is incorrect there were five of them. The two not mentioned in the original myth had special abilities. They could take on human appearance and had additional powers that the other three did not. These two were more deadly and evil than the other three put together.

Here is an old drawing of the three mentioned in myths:

Now here are the other two not mentioned in the original myths because they concealed themselves that many have no idea of their existence. They do not have the ability to turn someone to stone. Their powers are far worse. One has the ability, that if she stares at you long enough will reduce to a pile of ashes. The other makes a cackling sound that will cause your heart to stop, with you dropping dead in your tracks. Here are what the other two Gorgons look like:

I think you can guess which one has which ability.
